Authorities finally recognize importance of Elevator Safety

Ontario, Canada -- There is nothing more scary and frustrating than being trapped in an elevator and not knowing when, if or how you are going to be rescued. This occurrence is the least of people's worries when it comes to elevator safety in North America. The amount of elevators that are being installed that do not meet code or are not even properly inspected to determine whether or not they meet code is astonishing. The current state of the elevator industry is really starting to turn some heads in the media. John McCarthy, A Florida Today reporter, recently ran a story called "Elevator inspections certifiably flawed - Lives in the balance as number of units rises, safety falls". McCarthy writes about the Florida inspection process and the difficulties which have risen since privatizing the inspections process in 2000. The issues which McCarthy talks about are not only happening in Florida, they are occurring throughout various jurisdictions in North America.

360 Controls has taken a strong stance in order to help educate and improve the process which equipment in North America is being inspected. We design and manufacture an elevator control system which is completely 2004 code compliant and has received certification from TSSA (3rd party certification) in Ontario. TSSA enforces some of the most stringent standards in the world and elevator safety is the primary goal of the organization.

We challenge every controller manufacturer, safety authority, and maintenance company to start putting safety ahead of all other things in order to stop this epidemic before more lives are lost due to negligence. It is our responsibility, as manufacturer, to make sure we supply products that are fully compliant to the latest safety codes. By doing this we will make elevators even safer for the rider and technicians.
